A: The extractor might be failing because it is trying to read your input files as UTF-8 and not GB2312. You could do two things. First, try to specify the encoding to be one of UTF-8 or GB2312 (or any other codec supported by your copy of the software you're extracting with). For example if you have WinRar, try opening the command prompt and typing winrar x "YourArchiveFile.rar" -o "YourOutputFile.rar" -encoding utf-8 Second, use a different software extractor, for example 7Zip as it doesn't support RAR at all. Alternatively, if you can extract with WinRar without problems, the log file will contain the default Encoding used by the software. You will probably need to convert this file to UTF-8 or GB2312. Fluidic enzyme-linked immunosorbent assays (ELISAs) are a significant tool in the diagnoses of infectious disease. Typically, these assays use whole virions as the antigen, which can be used for the detection of diverse pathogenic organisms, including bacteria, viruses, parasites, and fungi. In most assays, the whole virion serves as a sole antigen, or a primary antibody (mAb) binds to the specific antigenic site of the virus. The resulting immune complex is recognized by secondary antibody which can be either antibody labeled (primary labeled with enzyme, secondary labeled with enzyme, fluorescent, etc.), or can contain an enzyme which can be reacted to provide a measurable signal. These current assays are designed to detect one or a few specific proteins or viral peptides per reaction. Thus, each assay is designed to detect one particular pathogenic organism. The necessary reagents are generally purified to near homogeneity and sterilized before use. Moreover, complex mixtures of antigens are purified to remove nonspecific binding agents before use, and must be standardized for each ELISA application. If multiple pathogens are to be detected, multiple ELISAs must be used. Sometimes, this
