Heart from rats made diabetic by injection of streptozotocin was studied in an in vitro contractility system at a subnormal temperature (10 degrees C). Histological analysis indicated atrial and ventricular hypertrophy, fibrosis, and endocardial thickness consistent with mild heart failure. Neither cardiac weight (7.5 +/- 0.1 vs 7.1 +/- 0.1 g) nor fiber length (339 +/- 8 vs 305 +/- 9 microns) was altered. Sarcomere length of cross-bridges was prolonged (6.64 +/- 0.06 vs 6.22 +/- 0.06 microns) and observed as an increased rigor tension development relative to control. Maximum tension developed at half-maximal activation in the presence of 10 microns [Ca2+] was equivalent to that of controls (90 +/- 9 vs 75 +/- 9 micron/s) despite a decreased Ca(2+)-sensitivity (pCa/pT changed by -0.10 +/- 0.02 pCa/pT). Maximum tension increased with fiber length due to mechanical coupling, and tension/pCa was unaffected by fiber length. Actin polymerization was unaffected. Maximal velocity (Vmax) of tension development in the presence of phalloidin was diminished in diabetic (0.094 +/- 0.013 vs 0.124 +/- 0.015 micron/s). These data suggest that atria and left ventricle from diabetic rats develop myocardial hypertrophy, fibrosis, and heart failure in a manner comparable to that observed in humans with long-standing, uncontrolled diabetes mellitus.Prevalence of nosocomial infections among ICU patients in Southwestern Nigeria.
