During the past decade, astrocytes have increasingly been recognized as important actors in the brain response to injury, particularly in ischemia. Numerous studies in animal models have revealed reactive morphological and molecular changes in astrocytes, but definitive proof of their importance is still lacking in humans. Therefore, this study investigated whether and to what extent astrocytes are activated in the rat and human brain after middle cerebral artery occlusion (MCAO). In two different experimental models of rat MCAO (60 or 90 min), astrocytic activation was demonstrated by morphological changes and increased immunoreactivity to the astrocyte-specific protein glial fibrillary acidic protein (GFAP). In contrast, in a rat model of transient forebrain ischemia (20-min occlusion of bilateral common carotid arteries), the number of GFAP-positive astrocytes did not significantly differ from sham-operated controls. In the human brain, staining for the astrocytic marker GFAP revealed few reactive astrocytes in the brain parenchyma 48-h postschemia, but numerous reactive astrocytes were observed within the penumbra of an infarct after 1 week. This increase in GFAP positivity was not significantly different from that in rats, where astrocytic reactivity was highest 24-h postschemia. These findings suggest that, in contrast to MCAO, ischemic brain
