. (Breadth) Having four frames of firewood in front, the fire in the hearth was neither burning nor smouldering. The wall of the house was then 10 feet high. The owner of an establishment in a firmly settled part of the Netherlands was finally able to run his generator when he lost the electricity supply. About a year later, a local council wrote down a check for 150 euros for ‘fine-tune-ing’ the building. Obviously, this was good news for the generator owner. He was particularly happy because his electricity supplier had cut off his power three times because, despite repeated advices, he had failed to check that all of his transformers were safely stacked. At the third cut-off, the generator once again took charge. This time he was ready: The transformers were stacked.
