Discussions of FramePaks :breakdown of framepaks If a home-owner were to try to hook up an existing computer to his TV, it would probably take him more than a day or two to figure out the settings and controls to get it up and running. (This is by no means a “surgical strike” technique. It is simply a by-pass of the link and a basic form of investigation to see how things fit. I have seen a number of situations where “by-passing” has saved time and money and enabled someone to get up and running almost immediately.) A TVXpert is something that can go in the van, hit the road and still have a reasonable probability of reaching the customer or setting up a convenient environment for a one-hour service call. “Product breakdown” is a term that takes the art out of service calls. Since most of the products are designed to perform a particular function, this term implies that someone somewhere is not performing that function. This is almost always the case. If you are a fan of the phrase, you can break down every product to the line in which it fails.
