This study explored the importance of a family medicine residency program's use of continuous quality improvement (CQI) and mentorship, particularly with regard to residents' understanding of quality improvement concepts, attitudes, and perceived importance of quality improvement. The three-question survey was sent via email to the directors of family medicine residency programs at the University of North Carolina. The survey was followed by a reminder and then a second, similar survey to all residents at the University of North Carolina. There were 84 respondents, with 54 family medicine directors and 393 residents. The majority of residents did not feel that their family medicine residency program required them to use a quality improvement curriculum (61%) or that they were taught quality improvement in residency (69%). For residents with previous experience using quality improvement, it was more important to understand quality improvement concepts ($P = .04$). For residents with no previous experience using quality improvement, it was more important to learn how to use quality improvement in residency ($P = .006$). For residents with no previous quality improvement experience, it was more important to have their program implement quality improvement ($P = .008$). Family medicine residency programs should have resident education programs that include CQI concepts, quality improvement curricula, and mentorship. Residents' perceived importance of quality improvement activities were linked to their previous quality improvement experience. The sheer size and complexity of modern software systems, the deluge of user interactions in modern software systems, and the resulting interactions between users and software systems have resulted in a need for a continuous stream of software system updates to keep pace with and exploit the rapidly changing nature of the software system environment. In contrast to earlier time-based software updates, the time-based updates can be deployed continuously without the need for user intervention. In the context of modern software systems, there are two main types of software system updates, or releases, in which new versions of a software system are made available to customers. These two types of updates are generally referred to as major and minor releases. The deployment of major releases is typically an event that marks the end of a development cycle for the software system. Minor releases are typically used to refine the functionality of the software system, as well as to fix
