Not only has a 75-year-old forest fire cut access from the tiny town in the heart of Alberta's Rockies to the outside world, it's also causing a bottleneck in the one road that links the area to the rest of the province. For at least a month, ambulances have been arriving at the Banff Trailhead, hoping to transport a few people who may need them to the closest hospital, but just as many people have been forced to stay, hoping for the government to fix the problem. "I don't think we've had one day of travel since the fire and everything is shut down," says Peter Marr. He's one of many people who have become stuck in a mountain-side community. The fire hasn't been out for more than a week. Still, the smoke has drifted in as far as the Banff National Park, stretching to the edge of the Columbia Icefield. Travelers to the park from all directions are being forced to take detours. "I just thought that I would be able to come home and ride my bike, have some fun," says Colleen Cuthand, who lives in the Banff area. "Instead of riding down the road that's right there, I've got to drive across the park. It's a long way off." Some of those travelers have only come to try to enjoy the park. "I don't think we're going to be able to get out because it's just not safe to go through," says Cody Cole. He hasn't been able to reach his family to make sure they're okay. "This is a small area that has about a couple of thousand people that call it home," says Eric Evon. "What would happen if we get a little worse?" But evacuation orders have not been issued.
