Isoflavone genistein exhibits breast cancer chemopreventive effects. However, the mechanisms by which it exerts this effect are still not clearly understood. In this study we elucidated the effects of genistein on the expression of cyclooxygenase-2 (COX-2) in normal and cancerous human breast tissues, and its correlation with the expression of estrogen receptor α (ER α), by using immunohistochemistry, Western blot and RT-PCR techniques. Our results showed that genistein suppressed the expression of COX-2 in normal breast epithelium and breast cancer tissues. The cells in the basal layer and luminal-like cells of the breast epithelium had abundant COX-2 expression, but the cells in the luminal layer did not. Genistein selectively targeted the basal and luminal-like breast epithelial cells. COX-2 protein expression in the basal and luminal-like breast epithelial cells was markedly suppressed by genistein.
