

UP TO SCREEN (TSV) - YouTube. Predictors of response to anti-TNF alpha therapy in patients with refractory rheumatoid arthritis. This study was designed to identify predictors of response to anti-tumor necrosis factor alpha (anti-TNF alpha) treatment in patients with refractory rheumatoid arthritis (RA). Seventeen patients (11 women, 6 men) were treated with either etanercept or infliximab. Their anti-TNF alpha therapy response was evaluated by measuring the disease activity index (DAS28) score before and after therapy, and by measuring the changes of the erythrocyte sedimentation rate (ESR) and C-reactive protein (CRP) levels. The following parameters were analyzed to determine their effect on therapeutic response: age, sex, duration of disease, duration of anti-TNF alpha therapy, duration of prior treatment, prior disease-modifying anti-rheumatic drug (DMARD) treatment, previous tumor necrosis factor (TNF) blocker therapy, disease activity, ESR, CRP, and DAS28 before treatment. Anti-TNF alpha therapy caused a significant decrease of ESR and CRP values, and a significant increase of DAS28 score. The DAS28 score was significantly improved in 10 of the 17 patients (59%). On univariate analysis, disease activity before anti-TNF alpha therapy, low disease activity after anti-TNF alpha therapy, and patient age were associated with response to anti-TNF alpha therapy. However, on multivariate analysis, disease activity before anti-TNF alpha therapy and duration of anti-TNF alpha therapy were significantly associated with response to anti-TNF alpha therapy. Disease activity at the time of anti-TNF alpha therapy is a key factor for predicting the response of patients with refractory RA to anti-TNF alpha therapy.
