"The political engagement model is founded on the idea that people engage in politics in order to share common interests. The most popular view of that is that it is a collective action problem: you can see it in the labor market. One of the things that people will do is go to work and get paid for it, but there are few if any paychecks that go to workers. Instead, the majority of paychecks go to the companies that employ those workers. The problem is the corporations are not run democratically. What is democracy? If you have a vote, how do you make sure that what you are choosing for yourself is going to improve things for you? "You can't just vote for your own interests. It's a very difficult problem to try to organize people around shared interests. The more an organization is a faceless organization, like a corporation, the more you can just take care of yourself, because you have no stake in the organization. So, in terms of having a large number of people engaged, it is a very difficult problem." If you were to look at political engagement with optimism, what would your vision of the future look like? "What is the vision of democracy? For me, I don't think you should be able to have a democracy where 99 percent of people don't vote and 1 percent of people run the show. I think the idea that the majority rule is an extremely dangerous idea. I don't want a society where I can vote for whatever I want to happen, and a very small minority can do what they want, and that makes the society a
