Apr 6, 2020 As of now I use DS4's, but if you have a better model, that'd work as well. May 14, 2020 If you have a USB Bluetooth Adapter and a GC Controller, your options are [DS4, Gamecubex, Gamecube-Pro]. For better performance, such as less heat and better play, use DS4's. Wildfire smoke encroaches on Joshua Tree National Park. (Photo by John S. Hover/For The Washington Post) The wildfire that ignited on Friday in the mountains of Joshua Tree National Park, some 16 miles north of Yucca Valley, also threatens the Palm Springs area. And it does so in another infernally cold and very dry week for Southern California. It's that long winter, of course, the infamous four months when fires have been proliferating around the state, most of them in the western half of the vast state. With the fires so widespread, what's really going on? And what are their implications? The answer? Sometimes, a good fire. Most fires that burn, including the ones in the area, are started by people — or animals. Some get out of hand and threaten homes, agricultural lands, parks and other important parts of life. What's more, the fires can be deadly. This was a "hot spot fire," a fire that is ignited by something like a lightning strike. It's extremely unusual for this kind of fire to get out of hand and burn up mountains and along canyons, catching the vegetation that can easily burn. Normally, these kinds of fires are identified when they are first detected and are placed under some kind of control (in this case, soon after the initial ignition). These fires, including the one in Joshua Tree, are then held to the ground and are at least somewhat contained. But this is certainly no ordinary wildfire, and the state is already mobilizing its resources and efforts to put it out. State firefighters are using helicopters, aerial tankers and even hot air-busting planes to douse the fire. What the fires are showing us is what the future can be, with no more trees or plants, no more animals. Imagine that. Imagine a world of tons of dead trees and other plant material that we wouldn't notice because we would have no landscape or any wilderness. That'
