On Wednesday, during a Senate hearing, it was evident that Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand was not through being the most ardent defender of the dumbest New York City police commissioner in history. The freshman Democrat senator, with strong political ambitions and an aggressive courtship of high-profile media figures like Katie Couric, said NYC Police Commissioner James O'Neill is "the best that New York City has to offer." That was a bit of an overstatement. Yet, in a few hours, O'Neill will be sworn in as the highest ranking police commissioner in New York City. And the path to a civil service pension is clear. The commissioner will get to remain an NYPD cop for the rest of his life. Unlike the average NYPD veteran, he will be entitled to about $133,000 a year for life, according to the standard actuarial table used for calculating pensions. On the average, that's probably more than the average NYPD police officer will earn from being a police officer. That's also more than some private sector workers in New York City earn by leaving their jobs. And O'Neill, the deputy police commissioner for operations, is currently operating as a de facto acting police commissioner. In a recent New York Times profile, O'Neill, who was previously the head of the NYPD's intelligence division, decried the "trashing" of the department by rank and file officers and civilians. He is, by all accounts, skilled at the tough jobs of policing the department and the city's schools. But on Wednesday, during the Senate hearing, Sen. Gillibrand, who sits on the Senate Commerce Committee, was the one who attacked O'Neill and defended de Blasio. In the city that gave birth to social justice warriors and produced the Wiedefeld and de Blasio regimes, can we really call Gillibrand (or her allies like de Blasio, and Mayor de Blasio) sane, smart, or rational? "I think a number of the things he's said or done since I've been in the Senate in terms of his role in policing and making sure that the citizens of our city are fairly and justly treated is completely unacceptable and cannot be allowed to go on," Gillibrand said. Did the city's
