editing softwareQ: In what order should the different parts of a plot be presented for best impact? I'm currently working on a book chapter in which I discuss subplots and their purpose in plot structure. I can't help but notice how good and versatile this tool is, even though I've only worked with it in medium-sized projects (Chapbooks, Graphic Novels, Short Stories, etc.).

Basically, in what order should different kinds of plot elements be presented in a narrative in order to convey the story best? That is, if all of the following elements are included in a sequence, what is the least important one to present? It's usually pretty easy to tell when to break up a plot because the action is moving towards a goal, but what about cases in which plot is being arranged by what is most important in the narrative? For example, I sometimes think that when presented in the order "Person A follows action B to reach event C" it can be rather confusing because it's not very clear where each element came from. Setting: is it better to show the setting (with nothing but a backdrop) before or after the story has progressed for too long? Plot: is it better to show the character's goals before showing the character's connections with other plot elements or vice-versa?

Character: do we want to know about the character's background first or do we need to show how the character interacts with the world and others before we can judge the character? Goal: do we
