Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to multi-signal devices, and in particular to the storage of multi-signals generated by such devices. 2. Description of the Related Art Electronic hardware devices having sensors are known in the art. These sensors may be for example, position sensors, voltage sensors, temperature sensors, and the like. For certain applications, it is desirable to store the sensor data generated by these sensors in a manner that allows the stored data to be readily accessible without the need for a power source. Many modern microelectronic devices incorporate multiple sensors. For example, the Global Positioning System (GPS) Radio Technical Manual, Vol. 1, D. G. Haussler, Editor, is hereby incorporated by reference. This manual describes how GPS signals can be received and then analyzed in order to calculate the position of the device using the satellites. This manual describes the properties of some of the signals transmitted by the satellites and how they may be received. The manual includes a list of the satellite positions and a brief description of the nature of the transmitted signals. In particular, the manual describes GPS signals as: "Each satellite continuously broadcasts the message P(Y), Y1, Y2, Y3. The satellite ID and the UTC time of transmission are included in the message. The message format is shown below. Each character is transmitted as a stream of 11 bits. This stream of bits is repeated every millisecond. The characters are transmitted in a specific order as shown below. The bandwidth of each signal is 10.23 MHz. The signal is
