Low bandwidth usageFord will discontinue the Explorer sport utility vehicle, a source familiar with the plans told Reuters on Tuesday, confirming an earlier report by Automotive News. The Explorer, based on a chassis shared with the Lincoln Navigator, has been a profitable model, with vehicles equipped with the most modern features and top safety ratings commanding a premium of more than $1,000 over base versions, analysts estimate. But the company's near-$10 billion SUV lineup, which is bigger than the market for small cars, is not doing well enough to justify spending on a unique model, two executives said last month. The cancellation was confirmed by a Ford official, who said the discontinuation was planned for a few years and was not related to the strategy of selling fewer vehicles globally in order to cut costs. Ford Motor said last month it would cut 10 percent of its global salaried workforce and close three factories in a move it said was aimed at focusing on growth markets like China and Asia. The automaker said it would discontinue most of the Escalade and Explorer models in North America, which include Canada, where both vehicles were recently discontinued. Kirk Davidson, a Ford spokesman, said in a statement on Tuesday that Ford is committed to operating profitably and remains on track to meet its 2018 earnings targets. "The Explorer is a great vehicle and it was great for a long time," Davidson said. "Unfortunately, the market is shifting and we feel the time is right to exit this business." Announcing the Explorer discontinuation, Ford said it would have no further comment on the vehicle until the sale process was complete. The Explorer's demise is an especially poignant moment for Ford, which more than a century ago first introduced the SUV. The Explorer is the sixth model in Ford's SUV lineup, joining the Ford Escape, Ford Edge, Ford Expedition, Ford Escape Sport and the new Ford
