I don't know why we just have to write "We once spent some time in the Prado" but not "We once spent some time in the Prado's" on a map. What is the reason? A: The Prado does not seem to have its own section with a heading (or heading/subheading) called "Prado". It's in the "Section: Museums" of the "Section: Museums for Children, Classical Museum, Royal Palace, Royal Alcazar and Vasco da Gama Barracks" that contains other museums like "Catalogue of Prado Museums" (which has "Prado's" as a heading). Ngrams for "Prado" and "Prado's" produce the following: Prado always before the s Prado's always after the s And it looks like the Prado is just a name, and Prado's is used as a noun. It also appears that titles like "Prado Museums" is common, so I'd guess that the singular "Prado" may be used to reflect this. You can also look at the Google Books Ngram Viewer for "Prado's" and "Prado". It appears that Prado's is more common. However, "Prado's" is more

Anatomy for Acupuncture: The Inner Surface of the Body. Acupuncture meridians are the human body's acupuncture points. They are points for which skin sensation (called a "meridian" by ancient Chinese civilization) is changed by acupuncture needle insertion. Learn about and locate acupuncture points, including anatomical locations and names. Discover how body organs and meridians function. The health principles of acupuncture are based on the relationship of the mind to the body. The foundation of the traditional system was that "life energy" flowed in certain mysterious channels called meridians, and these meridians traveled from the head to the foot, called the "Sea of Energy". This article addresses important concepts of traditional acupuncture (TCM) that are not generally discussed in the general media, but are essential to understanding this fascinating theory. The meridian concept is the principal aspect of acupuncture that is now generally agreed upon. It has been a focus of controversy for centuries, but is now generally accepted. It is supported by physiological and anatomical evidence as well as extensive experience. Many acupuncture experts question the existence of a clear-cut "principal" meridian, but they agree that it can be located somewhere in the body along a pathway of body fluid and vessels. The meridian concept has been misunderstood for centuries and still varies widely from person to person, as well as from time to time. Traditional medicine talks about "channels" and "acupuncture points" and defines them as such. Acupuncture meridians are "energy channels" that are found inside the body throughout the entire length of each of the 32 body parts, from the scalp to the feet. Acupuncture points are the points along each meridian where there is a change in the flow of energy along the channel. There are only 12 "large" meridians in the Chinese body (corresponding roughly to the 12 main energy pathways in the brain, the heart, lungs, kidneys, liver, spleen, stomach, small intestine, large intestine, gallbladder, bladder, and genital organs), and 26 "small" meridians are found in the musculoske 82138339de
