Watchdog goes for 180 days without Senate approval AP

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP) -- Pennsylvania's top law enforcement official has been temporarily given more than $280,000 of taxpayer money to assist in an investigation of his own actions. The state police watchdog has been given legal authority to spend the money because of allegations he embezzled more than $70,000 while serving as a lieutenant with the state Bureau of Liquor Control Enforcement.

Attorney General Josh Shapiro ordered the investigation last fall, just days before he was sworn in as attorney general. The order says the money was approved in October by then-Attorney General Kathleen Kane, and is being spent during the investigation's "discovery" phase. That includes reviewing documents and interviewing witnesses. It's unclear how much of the money has been spent. The order says police reports and email correspondence are being reviewed, but no interviews have been conducted. The money comes from the Attorney General's Office and is spent through the state police. Copyright 2013 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. Johnson has been a church secretary, an office manager and a secretary to a chiropractor. She also worked at a photography lab, the last of which she says was a career high point. She says she can't recall all the places she's worked. In the years since she's changed jobs, however, she's been able to put together a solid portfolio. Her work experience has helped her to get some of the jobs she's held. The plain truth is that the "resume" isn't the main reason she gets hired. The background check is more important. And fortunately for Johnson, she said, she doesn't get many that ask about a "suspended" license. Johnson said, while she's been approved to serve as a church secretary, it's largely a ceremonial role. "I just basically be at the meetings when needed," she said. The church secretary position is what

Johnson now holds. She and some close friends who were staying at Johnson's fiancé's house had returned home from a trip the evening of Dec. 27 when a storm passed through the area. Johnson said that when she went to her truck to go home, she realized that the truck's windshield was badly damaged from falling branches. After inspecting the truck and calling her father, Johnson said she realized

Brush The Brush tool is used for editing images. You can select a Color or an Opacity, control how the brush stroke behaves and use the Oil Paint Filter and Surface Blur Filter to achieve different effects. There are three modes for the Brush tool: eraser, airbrush and painting, which you can switch between by clicking on the Tool icon in the tool bar. In the eraser mode, you can choose a preset opacity setting or create a custom opacity and size. In the airbrush mode, you can increase or decrease pressure to control how fast the brushstroke grows. You can also choose how much of the brushstroke is painted as soon as the brushstroke is completed. In the painting mode, you can paint on a new layer. With the Photoshop Color Picker, you can choose any color or change the brush color. Eraser Brush Switch to Eraser Brush by clicking on it. The Brush's Opacity and Size settings remain unchanged. Click and drag to create a stroke. This works like a paintbrush. Click again to erase the stroke. Click once to change the opacity of the stroke. Increase the brush size and create a stroke. Click to change the size of the stroke. Click and drag to create a new stroke. You can also use the Eraser tool. Color Picker in the Eraser tool dialog box. Create a shape with the Polygonal Lasso tool. Click and drag to create a shape. Click and drag a corner or vertex of the shape to move it. Select the Shape Lasso tool and click to change the shape's outline. Select the Brush tool and click to switch to the Brush tool. Gradient Tool Switch to the Gradient tool by clicking on it in the tool bar. Click and drag anywhere on the canvas to create a linear gradient, or to change the color or opacity of the gradient. To set the endpoint of the gradient, click once on the gradient icon. A small highlight appears at the endpoint of the gradient. Click once on the endpoint to set the endpoint of the gradient. Click and drag to create a new endpoint. Convert the gradient to a color stop. Click once to select a color and click again to start drawing a stop. Add a more stop by clicking once on the gradient icon.
