The up-and-down battle on the ballot this November pits one of the largest political parties in the United States against one of the best-organized civic organizations in the country: the Bradley Effect. This week marks the beginning of the most critical phase of the debate over legalization, in which both sides—and even a few third parties—are gearing up for a big push for voters to turn out in November. At issue is a ballot initiative in Washington, D.C., that will ask voters if the city should allow adults to possess, grow and use marijuana. D.C. is one of several jurisdictions expected to see legalization measures emerge on ballots this fall. In New York City, ballot initiatives are playing out against a more established backdrop of legalization advocates and pot activists, each with deep pockets to spend on advertising. Such campaigns would face a giant, incumbent foe: Gov. Andrew Cuomo, a champion of legalization who has the overwhelming support of his party's leadership and big-money donors. RELATED: The fight over medical marijuana in Illinois A similar ballot measure in November will pit the city of Denver and the state of Colorado against an established cannabis industry. And over in Ohio, a group of pro-legalization activists have filed a measure with the secretary of state's office to take a direct approach to the issue. The group's mission is to gather enough signatures to get the measure on the November ballot. "Our mission is not to legalize marijuana, but to allow the people of Ohio to decide," an activist associated with the group said. "We want the adults in the state to make this decision." This week, they intend to begin their signature-gathering mission outside the capital in Columbus, the state's largest city. A Bradley Effect in DC?
