Divinity: Original Sin 2 Windows Mac Steam + Mods | IGN Wiki A: There is a character planning program called "Character-Planner" available for Windows. In addition to a useful character planning tool, it has a wiki page where players are encouraged to share their build strategies. A: I've been using Excel for the past few years, and I like it a lot because it gives me the possibility to compare two builds, as well as maintaining track of total stats. You can find a spreadsheet here. It also has some options to automatically generate it: Use Character-Planner's sheet, or Use the sheet generated with the 'character planner' option from the spreadsheet Note that the latter is not accurate enough: I'll try to add more info. A: Using this utility, you can generate a character sheet with the desired character attributes and abilities. A good explanation of this utility can be found here. Q: How to make sure a proccess has ended gracefully on the server side I have a windows service that runs as a process. When the process ends, I want to be able to send a signal to the process to tell it to finish gracefully. I'm doing this with the Win32 API. My service is started and terminated with different code. Is it ok to just terminate it like this? How can I make sure that the signal gets sent to the service properly? A: I have to say that terminating a process with TerminateProcess is not the way to go if you want to do it correctly. As @aschipfl said you should use

TerminateThread. But actually in your case TerminateThread will not work. What you can do is the following. When your service is started you set a threading flag in a static field in your service. In your service class, add this method: protected void OnThreadEnd() { if(Thread.CurrentThread.IsAlive) Thread.CurrentThread.Abort(); } When the thread ends you check if the flag is set and if so you abort the current thread. But unfortunately, the cost to achieve the dream is higher than a nominal or symbolic tax. The real price is a life lost to drugs. That is the cost of maintaining the image. With
