That's what the best high-powered businesswomen in Hollywood do, says Maureen Craig, a Dallas-based "Life Style Coach." "People think that a woman is smart, confident, and the most successful when she looks like a fashion model or a movie star or an editor or a lawyer," says Craig. "They assume that these women are feisty. They're not. They're not feisty at all. They're conforming to a standard that's been set, which is, 'I look like everyone else in the department -- and what everyone else does.'" Craig, who's also the author of "Secret Wives and Lovers: Amazing Advice from Women Who've Been There" and "Power Moms: Winning the No-Compromise Parenting Battle," helped found the Coalition for Compassionate Living in Dallas, and has been advising women on the five-day empowerment-training program for the past two years. One of her clients was a woman who works for a huge media company, she says. "She's a really good woman, and she was managing her life, but she was unhappy in this high-pressure position," she says. "And we talked about the media standard for strong women and how to dress to meet it. She ended up in a pair of sleek black pants, a charcoal gray blazer, and black pumps, with a pair of nail scissors in her pocket." "It was a great moment for her," says Craig. "When she left, she had her nail scissors in her hand. She was ready. Her nails were painted red." "Her nails are not white," says Craig. "She's supposed to be holding a small box of files, and we're meant to believe she's high-powered and powerful, but she looks like someone who's under control of a nail-pincher." The shirt she wore had buttons, and a pearl or diamond pin. "That's what's expected of her. Her hair was cut into a conservative business cut. She was wearing the standard makeup -- just a bit of mascara, a bit of liner. 1cb139a0ed
