Easy Driver Pro Proteomic analysis of the innate immune response in the mosquito Culex pipiens complex. The molecular mechanisms of the host-pathogen interaction in mosquitoes have been scarcely investigated. In this study, two-dimensional gel electrophoresis combined with mass spectrometry was employed to determine changes in the Culex pipiens complex mosquito proteome after immune stimulation with Escherichia coli. Thirty-five proteins were identified as significantly modulated. Most of these proteins are involved in defense mechanisms, carbohydrate metabolism, cell growth/division and cell adhesion. Eight proteins with putative immune function were analyzed in more detail. RNA interference was used to study the role of the Cp9A protein in an anti-microbial defense response, and Western blot analysis showed the immunogenic potential of the Crude Extract, which was used to elicit a humoral immune response in larvae of C. quinquefasciatus. This work provides evidence of the effect of bacterial stimulation in C. pipiens complex, indicating that the strategies employed by the host to avoid or limit pathogen invasion are important for the mosquito survival in the environment.
