The transfer format of the member storage device (MSD) in the library content cannot be determined. Neither of the MP4 trailers nor the MP3 streams is playing properly and the media player is giving an error message. The invention relates to a method for the determination of a modulus and an apparatus for the determination of a modulus. A description of a method for the determination of a modulus of a motor vehicle is found in DE102006015812. It is proposed therein to superimpose a driving signal which leads to a structural element of the motor vehicle on a driving signal which leads to an operating element of the motor vehicle, and to register the influence of this superimposition via an acceleration signal of the motor vehicle, and to determine the value of the modulus. A disadvantage of such a method is that it is relatively complicated. Q: Modeling a class to represent multiple types Let's say I have a class called "Thing" and I want to use it to store a variety of different types of objects. In Java, it would be easy to have one class that's a superclass for all the different subtypes. public class Thing extends Object { } And then create different subclasses like this: public class Car extends Thing { } public class Boat extends Thing { } public class OtherThing extends Thing { } What is a solid design pattern for this case? One pattern that comes to mind is to use two separate classes: public class Thing { } public class ThingCar extends Thing { } public class ThingBoat extends Thing { } public class ThingOther extends Thing { } This works, but it seems kind of redundant to have the Thing class twice. I can also foresee some problems if something is stored in that Thing and it ends up being a different class at runtime (the whole point of the Thing class being a superclass). What are the best practices for this sort of design? A: I'd go for something like this: public abstract class Thing { } public class Car extends Thing { } public class Boat extends Thing { } public class OtherThing extends Thing { } You can also consider using an interface, you would need to
