Difference between login to AD using the Machine Account and the local account I know the difference between using a domain account (authenticated using net logon) and local account. My question is, why do we need to log in using Machine Account? A: What is a machine account? A machine account (aka local account) is an account that is used on a computer to log on to the computer. This account is not a domain account, and the account is not a member of any groups that are associated with a domain. This type of account is identified by the UserAccountType property. A domain account is a special type of local account that has a password or other security information that is required for connection to a domain. Local domain accounts are identified by the UserAccountType property. User accounts that are obtained from a device that is used in a domain can be treated as domain accounts. Machine accounts are defined in the local computer configuration on the computer where they are used. These accounts are not part of a domain, and are stored separately from user accounts. What is the purpose of a machine account? The machine account is used by computers, and thus, their login process handles the identification of the network resource to which the computer logs on. Possible uses for a machine account? For example, a Windows workstation that is running Exchange Server 2013 (or Exchange Server 2016) could utilize this login method, because Exchange Server 2013 (or Exchange Server 2016) uses it to discover the target resources that are used for downloading email messages from the system. Another example is that if you were using Windows Server 2012 R2 Standard, you could configure a local account that was configured as a network device account. This type of account would help users log on to a computer over a network, but it would only need to identify the target computer on the local network and not need to know about other computers on the domain (assuming all of the computers are configured for Windows Server 2012 R2 Standard). Best Practice Tips The best practice is to always use user accounts. The machine accounts should be limited to computers that are not used in a domain environment.
