Social cognition refers to the cognitive processes involved in social interactions. This domain is impaired in schizophrenia. It has also been shown that negative symptoms are also impaired in schizophrenia. We explored the relationship between social cognition and negative symptoms in a sample of 40 medicated schizophrenic patients. Social cognition was measured by using the Multiple Faces-Multiple Reaction Time Test and the Reading the Mind in the Eyes test. Negatively and positively worded items were created and were compared for each social cognition task. Analyses revealed an overall significant difference between the two groups for all tasks. Correlation analyses revealed a strong and significant negative correlation between negative symptom severity and accuracy of reading the mind in the eyes' test. In contrast, the correlation between negative symptom severity and the accuracy of the multiple faces-multiple reaction time test was negative and not significant. It is suggested that negative symptoms in schizophrenia may impact social cognitive processes differently, specifically impairing the ability to infer intentions from faces.Renal nerve activity, atrial natriuretic peptide, and vasopressin in young and aged rats. To determine whether the alteration in circulating levels of atrial natriuretic peptide (ANP) and vasopressin (AVP) in aged rats may play a role in the increased renal nerve activity (RNA) in this age group. Plasma levels of ANP and AVP and RNA of left and right renal nerves were measured in young (2 months) and aged (18 months) rats under anesthesia. Systolic blood pressure was also measured under the same condition. ANP levels were significantly lower in aged rats than in young rats, whereas there was no significant difference in plasma AVP level between young and aged rats. Left and right
