Often times, simply thinking about the diet and lifestyle habits that would aid us in getting and staying fit can help more than the purchases that we make. With that in mind, when it comes to choosing products that would help us become the best versions of ourselves, the supplement industry is ever so important. This industry provides us with products that are 100 percent safe, natural, and that are backed by medical research and clinical studies. Below are some of our favorite nootropics for men that have been backed by clinical trials. For a list of the best nootropics for men, click here. 1. Serotonin. These are commonly referred to as essential oils, as the oils are obtained directly from the plant and have a high concentration of these essential oils. In a general sense, the oils are used in aromatherapy to soothe, relax, or to promote restful sleep, although it is recognized that the effects may vary with each person. Most commonly, the oils are used in a massage technique. For the massage technique to be effective, the oils need to be at a high concentration of the essential oils and not in a base oil. The highest concentration of essential oils, with respect to an aromatic plant's oil, is generally found in the leaf, stems, or flowers. Unfortunately, the essential oils are highly volatile and have a very short shelf life. The shelf life of the essential oils is only a few months. As a result, the majority of the essential oils used in aromatherapy are available in the form of a solution of the essential oils in an oil base. Most commonly, this solution is in the form of an eau de cologne. For example, the essential oils are available in cologne bottles which contain a solution of the essential oils in an oil base. The cologne solution has a very limited shelf life, as it has a very short period of stability. As a result, the cologne bottle should be opened and used within approximately two to six weeks of opening the bottle. If the cologne bottle is not used within this time period, then the cologne solution becomes very unstable and may change color, become hazy, or even cause the cologne bottle to break. As a result, it is generally not recommended to keep cologne bottles more than six months of age. There are currently no aromatherapy solutions available on the market that can be stored at room temperature for extended periods of time. Currently, all aromatherapy solutions are stored at refrigeration temperatures. As a result, the cologne bottles are refrigerated, as they are stored for several months. Aromatherapy bottles, including those used for colognes, are generally single use bottles. After the bottle is opened, there is generally no way to prevent the essential oils and oil base from separating. As a result, a new bottle of the cologne solution must be purchased whenever the original cologne bottle is opened. Aromatherapy oils may also be purchased in pill or liquid form. For example, essential oils may
