New Sunshine State Law Prohibits Discrimination against Transgender People Former State Rep. Michelle Rehwinkel Vasilinda worked hard to pass Florida's anti-bullying law in the wake of the 2007 tragedy at McKinley High School, but she's thrilled with the addition of a provision that's especially aimed at transgender students. The former military officer and state representative just signed a law on Wednesday barring discrimination in public schools based on gender identity or expression. "That's big," Rehwinkel Vasilinda said. "Most of the discrimination is based on gender identity." Among her proudest legislative achievements, the law requires a school district to allow a transgender student to use a facility designated for the student's gender identity. The law also requires school districts to let transgender students use the school restroom of their choice. It applies to all public schools in Florida, including charter schools. Both of the school-related portions of the law were inspired by the 2007 tragic death of then-15-year-old Tyler Clementi at the hands of a roommate. Clementi had been gay, and his roommate secretly recorded him kissing another man before drowning himself in the New York City Hudson River. After passing the House that year, the anti-bullying law was reauthorized in 2009 but left out the transgender students provision. In a news release, Rehwinkel Vasilinda said she approached the law's sponsor, Republican Rep. Kathy Castor, after the law passed the House with that provision, and Castor told her the provision wasn't ready for the Senate. "But I told her, 'That's OK,'" Rehwinkel Vasilinda said. "I said, 'I'm not here to be a legislator or a political person. I'm just here to work for students and families.'" The Florida law also bans discrimination based on sexual orientation. As a Marine officer, Rehwinkel Vasilinda led a "Sister City" exchange with the rural Korean village of Yongmun, and she said she
