We studied the effect of the deterioration of anticoagulation on selenium status in a population of 105 household residents undergoing chronic warfarin therapy. A 50% rise in anticoagulant dose for a mean relative warfarin maintenance dose of 3.1 +/- 0.3 mg/day resulted in a 60% decline in mean selenium concentrations of the serum and a 70% decline in that of the erythrocytes. Serum selenium, both total and percent of normal, correlated positively with the mean warfarin maintenance dose (Spearman's rank:  $r = 0.54$ ,  $p = 0.0001$ ) and negatively with the mean initial anticoagulant dose ( $r = 0.36$ ,  $p = 0.002$ ). Severence of anticoagulant therapy resulted in a significant decline in selenium concentrations in erythrocytes ( $p = 0.03$ ) but not in serum. These findings suggest that selenium supplementation is warranted for this population of patients undergoing chronic anticoagulation, especially those whose anticoagulant regimen is reduced. Further work is necessary to determine the threshold level of serum selenium below which there is a risk of inadequate anticoagulation, and the optimal dose and duration of selenium supplementation to maintain the level.[Diet and breast cancer]. Breast cancer is the first cause of death by cancer in women worldwide and is also the tumor for which the diet has been most clearly associated in the etiology. Breast cancer has been clearly associated with obesity and overweight, the intake of high amounts of animal fat, and probably also with the intake of dietary fibers, vitamins, nutrients, and certain micronutrients. On the other hand, although several authors agree that the intake of vegetables, fruits, grains, and dairy products have a protective effect, there is no consensus on the quantitative relevance of the protective effect, the food groups which are responsible for it, and whether it can be ascribed to a specific nutrient.HONG KONG (Reuters) - China's new cabinet on Friday vowed to crack down on “

It was one of our biggest events, and led us to compare the future of public planning with the movements happening in cities, for example Artificially Intelligent Cities and the rise of Cloud Architectures and Places. This issue is packed with valuable insights and
