We have not yet begun to fight these wars, and perhaps some day the best way to deal with these problems will be to make them so plain as to be beyond dispute. The Hitler Problem - Can't Decide on a Narrative? Churchill, in The Hinge of Fate, wrote about the decision to give a collective name for the Axis Powers, writing in part: "It was a bold decision. It meant that all who had hitherto respected the inviolability of the name 'Germany' would now be invited to associate with her in a commonly shared venture which would be, no doubt, immensely popular and perhaps triumphal, but which was also, to say the least, potentially momentous. Very few historians, if any, will dispute that the experiment of adding 'Germany' to 'Axis' was a great success and, indeed, all the arguments as to why

It's not a virus, it's a blessing) Will Michael Cherry Monday

Feb 3, 2013 at 12:01 AMFeb 3, 2013 at 11:13 PM I have been reading the accounts of the many people who have benefited from the "phenomenon" referred to as the PFAPA (Persistent Fatigued Allergy Parsis and Periodic Fever Acquired after the Age of 6) syndrome. The more than 100 affected children I have seen at St. Joseph's in the last eight months have borne more than their share of the weight of this very visible disorder. As with any such complex disorder, PFAPA takes longer to understand and therefore to manage. Recently, this "complexity" in diagnosis and treatment became more evident to me than ever as I met with about a half-dozen of these children's parents who, despite the many hours spent in appointment after appointment with pediatric specialists, clinicians, and therapists, had been unable to find a solution to the children's plight. In this case it was a child who was perpetually fevered and unable to keep a steady sleep schedule who had been hospitalized for two months when I last saw her and who was transferred for the very same reason more than a week later. It was a mother who had been reared in Europe and who therefore found herself baffled by the lack of recognition of her child's obvious mental and physical fatigue and emotional anxiety. One of the concerns that I hear most frequently is that the children's chronic illness is so much a part of their daily lives that it seeps into everything and nothing can be done about it. It has to be accepted. I never accept that as a reason for prolonging a child's suffering, even when it is very hard for a parent to accept the fact that her or his child cannot do the same things that they have done all their lives. I always urge the parents I see to be relentless in 3da54e8ca3
