This article presents the concept of patient education in dentistry, based on the results of studies carried out by the authors. Such practice can be divided into 4 stages: introduction, orientation and assessment, technique instruction, and evaluation of learning. The first of these stages involves the introduction of the patient, which requires the use of simple, easy-to-follow, and reassuring teaching procedures. The content of the information to be presented must be based on the most practical guidelines of the current literature. The orientation stage begins with individualized teaching, which includes not only a review of the patient's clinical findings, but also a teaching of the patient's family; at this stage it is possible to identify patients who need guidance at a lower level of intellectual development, because the information presented will be less difficult for them to understand. Teaching also includes a review of the technique, ensuring that the patient has a full understanding of this procedure. The third stage deals with the evaluation of the patient's progress, which allows the educational process to be carried out more efficiently and more effectively. Information provided during the different phases must be updated to ensure that current knowledge is preserved and that the learning needs of the patient are met.Lon G. Seltzer Lon G.
