How to decompile a.exe file to obj? Delphi Decompiler full crack |delphi decompiler full crack|delphi decompiler full crack|delphi decompiler full crack|delphi decompiler full crack| Decompile a dll to d source Decompile code with Delphi .~~~ urza This is a problem I faced before, and one I've spent a lot of time figuring out. Creating a service that can respond to http requests without the need of firewalls is a very tricky task. The first idea I had for a solution was to make some changes to the firewall code, and instead of just blocking the connection at the firewall, find the frontend url that the request is headed to and return a 200 OK response, but hide the real target url using an iframe that loads the url that's behind the frontend url. But then I thought how am I going to generate javascript that would load into the iframe?! Html isn't a programming language, and using html tags like and won't work in the iframe either. Then I remembered my friend's post that went something like "I don't want to learn another programming language, it's not the time, I'm focused on my business now, what else can I do." It made me think that this is something you can easily do with a little bit of grunt work. I ended up going with the method suggested in the article and just creating a file that would hit the backend and respond back to a return status with the returned data and send the frontend url with it, hopefully making sure it doesn't get intercepted. ----- albertzeyer This is probably not the best, or most secure or most efficient way (again, not some optimized sourcecode generator, but a use-case to generate use cases) to automatically generate an API. It is already said, that the approach is not perfect and it should be fixed by the developers. The thing is: the approach should be: Avoid needlessly adding security for the API by developers themselves. So, make the API as easy as possible, by developers or maybe by some framework/language layer,
