I know that all matter and energy is eventually condense to nothing, however, I was wondering why would there not be life when the universe was just compressed from nothing? If we presume that everything is compressed at a very high temperature to the minimum size, why would there be nothing but mass? A: The first part of your question asks why there wouldn't be life out of nothing. The second part asks why the universe should be beginning to be compressed with everything at a very high temperature. The first part can be answered fairly easily. The universe is expanding and cooling with time. This means that most of the energy is in the form of a cosmological constant
