Silica-based polymer microspheres are attractive for the many applications related to the sorption of biologically important species such as proteins, DNA, and peptides. Preparation of functionalized silica-based polymer microspheres with various ligands, including amino groups, carboxylic acid groups, and sulfonate groups, can be accomplished by two different and complementary synthetic approaches, solvent removal-based assembly and hydrolysis-based synthesis. In the first method, the polymer is prepared from a mixture of reagents dissolved in a hydrophilic solvent (e.g., water) via a polycondensation reaction, and the desired functional group is subsequently attached by postsynthetic modification. In the second method, silica-based polymer microspheres, typically synthesized by a sol-gel process, are further functionalized with the desired ligand groups. The reaction may occur upon synthesis of the microspheres or after they are prepared. In the first method, functional groups can be attached to the polymer backbone via a reaction between the amino groups of a precursor silica-based material and

The structure of the Russian health system has been affected by the rapid changes in the economic-organizational-and-medical-technological conditions of development. A number of reforms in the system of state and social health services, in health development, and in the legal framework for the health service market are aimed at the optimal organization of the system. A major factor in this policy is the principle that health services should be provided to the population on an absolutely free basis. For this purpose, social health services, as the primary means of providing medical care to the population on an absolutely free basis, are of special significance. Regulations on social health services may entail a number of specific provisions in the activities of doctors, pharmacists and nursing staff. These specific provisions entail no legal contradictions and may be an important motivation for effective implementation of the principle of free access to health services. In the Russian health system, there is a considerable share of the following specific provisions: the social health service is provided free of charge; no fees may be charged on medical treatment that does not have a therapeutic effect; the means of reimbursement of medicines and services for patients in social health systems are established; the diagnosis and treatment of patients by means of radiological diagnostic technologies is free of charge; treatment of patients with traditional medicine is free of charge; the physician has a right to prescribe medical objects on the patient's demand and is free to perform therapeutic treatment in his office or in the patient's home.Andrews Park, St. Louis Andrews Park is a neighborhood on the North Side of St. Louis, Missouri. It is bordered on the north by Delmar Boulevard, on the east by Glenwood Avenue, on the south by Olive Street, and on the west by Collins Avenue.
