The onset of an immune response in a T cell occurs in three steps. First, T cell receptors recognize a peptide presented by major histocompatibility complex (MHC) molecules on antigen presenting cells (APCs). This recognition event leads to the second step in the reaction, downregulation of the TCR-CD3 complex on the surface of the T cell. Receptor downregulation is required for the T cell to avoid self-reactivity in the face of a vast excess of self peptide-MHC complexes. However, even an MHC-restricted T cell must be able to ignore self-antigens in order to avoid autoimmunity. This third step in the immune response, where the immune system must monitor for small, yet potentially profound fluctuations in the antigen load, is the focus of this proposal. This "spatiotemporal" monitoring of antigen load is hypothesized to be executed through TCR signaling. However, TCR signaling may occur when antigen is ligated to a TCR at a specific time, in a specific location, on a specific T cell type or if there is a surge in peptide/MHC complexes that are recognized but have a low affinity for the TCR. The significance of this proposal is its focus on TCR signal transduction to define the spatiotemporal regulation of the T cell response. The project will use in vitro T cell assays using T cells from mice expressing a TCR that can be induced to downregulate its TCR by ligating it to a known immunogenic peptide. The project will also utilize siRNA to knock down the

There is currently limited evidence for the current and future impacts of ocean acidification on coral reef fish communities. The aim of this study was to investigate the consequences of a future scenario of temperature rise on coral reef fish communities, using a species-based approach. We tested the ability of six coral reef fish species to adjust their performance in a short-term natural seawater acidification experiment at a pH of 7.7, 7.8 and 8.0, using respirometric responses. The experimental results show a wide range of tolerance to changes in seawater pH, with pronounced impacts on species that are not able to maintain their metabolic demand at the tested pH values. Our results provide evidence that the performance of coral reef fish species with fully functioning behaviours was much more sensitive to seawater acidification than those that could only perform essential behaviours. These findings suggest that caution is needed when predicting the impacts of ocean warming on coral reef fishes based on long-term predictions.
