Incomplete compression of an aneurysmal cyst of the mediastinum. Aneurysmal cysts are slow-growing malformations that may be associated with mediastinal abnormalities. Aneurysmal cysts of the mediastinum usually manifest with compression symptoms and have been confused with acute mediastinal syndromes, such as angina pectoris, acute pericarditis, or an aortic aneurysm. Computed tomography is the method of choice for diagnosing mediastinal masses. This is a case report of an incompletely diagnosed aneurysmal cyst, which presented as an atypical chest wall abscess.Enantiomeric separation of bufalin using capillary electrophoresis with chiral complementary chiral selector. An enantiomeric separation of bufalin was studied by capillary electrophoresis (CE) in a system employing chiral complementary selector (CISS) and beta-cyclodextrin (CD) under the influence of direct current. The CE system comprised a fused-silica capillary of 0.8 x 50 mm (50 microns i.d.) and an uncoated capillary of 75 microns i.d. The CISS is based on the difference in specificities of sodium 2-naphthalenesulfonate (2-NHS) for DL- and D-alpha-CD complexes. The influence of separation conditions, such as applied voltage, the concentration of the CISS and the buffer pH, were investigated. A biphasic separation was obtained in a mixture of a solution containing 100 microg ml(-1) DL-alpha-CD and 20 microg ml(-1) 2-NHS with phosphate buffer (20 mM, pH 3.0), 2-NHS (5 mM), DL-alpha-CD (30 mM) and voltage of 14 kV at 20 degrees C. The enantiomeric separation was completed within 30 min. The DL- and D-enantiomers were baseline-resolved when the chiral selector concentration was below 50 mM in the run buffer, whereas the D-enantiomers were eluted at higher concentrations. The migration order of bufalin enantiomers was D->L-bufalin.F-15 Eagle Filmed Breaking Thermal While on routine training mission in the Alps in October 2000, an F-15 Eagle pilot spotted a huge glazed
