But is there any reason why we should take it as a good thing rather than a bad thing or am I seeing something where I am not? Is there any reason for me to just be cool with it? A: Although the images are fairly unimportant to the subjects, it's not unusual for the partner to use images of other women to soothe the egos and distract the subject from their own shortcomings. Also, as you correctly point out, the recipient doesn't necessarily have to be a woman. It's also one of the ways people deal with the unexpected pregnancy. The worst part of it is that some women have to get it from a friend, their mother or a stranger. (I'm not being sexist here.) Taken a step further, some men will request "schoolgirl " photos to "stimulate" a woman. (Sexist much?) A: I'm not sure that there is a problem with it, and that it shouldn't be frowned upon. After all, men have to deal with their own insecurity as well as the sometimes crazy expectations that are met with the words "swooning beauty". As you rightly say, "art imitates life", and we can both draw comparisons between the two. I can only say from personal experience, though, that it is quite normal for partners to use images of themselves, clothed or half clothed to "show off" their partner's attributes as well as the attributes of others. It's a simple reflex. Neither partner needs to like it or approve of it, just understand it in a nonjudgemental way. I hope this helps. A: I think it's perfectly normal to use photos of your own body, clothed or otherwise, for some reasons. It's a way to show your partner what you really look like. Yes, he's a man, but he's seen how you look at the gym, in the mirror, etc. He's not blind, he knows. So in some way he can't help noticing how you look in these photos, d0c515b9f4
