The default option is Files, where your images are stored. This is the same place that Photoshop saves images from during a save or export function. If you're using Windows, then a great location for storing images on your computer is the Photos folder. To open this folder in Windows, press Start and type "Photos" in the search field. Navigate to this folder by clicking on the tab located on the left side of the window. Once you're in the "Photos" folder, look for all the photos you'd like to add to Photoshop. They should be stored under the "Images" folder. Open one of the images in Photoshop and click on the Open button. The Photo Import dialog box will be opened for this photo. You'll be able to select the location on your computer that you want to import the photo from, as well as what type of image it is (JPEG, PNG, etc.). You can also change the properties of the photo, which includes rotating it clockwise or counterclockwise, adjusting the brightness and contrast, as well as adding a border. By default, Photoshop will go through your files and look for any layers that contain a photo that you selected in the Import window. If you don't see the photo you've selected, then just continue to navigate through the "Photos" folder and look for it again. When Photoshop finds a layer that contains the photo, it will import the photo as a selection. In the above example, the image was imported as a selection. This means that you could go to the Layers panel and view the layers which contain the photo. Click on the layer to edit it. You can then continue to edit the photo by selecting different tools or using the tools' functions. The photo below was also imported as a selection. Clicking on this layer shows you the selection, the layers that were placed on top of the photo, as well as the merge mode

Autophagy-induced p62 degradation is required for early phagosome maturation and intracellular replication of respiratory syncytial virus. A central role of the selective autophagy pathway in intracellular innate immunity has been established by knockdown experiments. Here we demonstrate that non-selective autophagy is necessary for efficient phagosome maturation and intracellular replication of respiratory syncytial virus (RSV). We find that interferon (IFN)-I signaling is required for the degradation of early and late autophagy cargo and for efficient RSV infection. Our data suggest that IFN-I signaling promotes autophagosome maturation by inhibiting p62-mediated phagophore elongation. Importantly, p62 depletion enhances early and late phagosome maturation and infection, thus extending the role of autophagy in innate immunity. Given its role in infection, we suggest that p62 can be considered as a target for anti-viral therapy. The future of China's government is at stake and Prime Minister Li Keqiang knows it. And that's why he's making an effort to reform the bureaucracy. The deputy premier, who is also China's premier designate, is said to have reviewed many documents since he took office in March and focused on discussions with bureaucrats to tighten regulations on the government and the party's ability to influence decision-making. Li has been a beneficiary of government efforts to trim the government's 300,000-plus personnel. The size of the army, for example, is about a quarter of what it was in 2014, according to government figures. While a few thousand heads have been trimmed, the increase in vacancies and expanded capabilities of trade unions and political parties in the past year has created larger challenges for Li. Late last year, Li set a goal for his party and the government to be cleaner, as he urged the party and the government to recognize and understand the importance of transparency and anti-corruption work. More recently, however, as Xi's anti-corruption campaign boiled over into the party and government, the focus has shifted to how to change behavior in Beijing that is seen to facilitate corruption. Li is also looking to dissolve many of the so-called local level organizations — that is, the local party branches — as well as lower-level and mid-level government employees.
