Q: Are the four scenarios outlined in the book So Your Old Dog Can't Teach You Anything? mutually exclusive? In Jay Rosen's So Your Old Dog Can't Teach You Anything: Outliving Your Human Dogs, he suggests four scenarios where human knowledge can be hard or even impossible to overcome because of the age of the humans involved: Boredom Intellectual disengagement The inability to listen The inability to learn (emphasis mine) Let's call these, for want of a better term, the "four dog snob scenarios": Scenario 1: A human senses something important, longs for it to be investigated further, but is unable or unwilling to investigate in the right way. Perhaps, after much effort, the human finally does try to investigate and makes some progress. This is hard work for someone who is not in the right mood to investigate and who might never find or understand what they're looking for. In Scenario 2, the human is able or willing to investigate, but senses something that is important and wishes to investigate it further (rewards themselves, but maybe a friend or family member is useful), but lacks the attention to detail required to do so in the right way. Human knowledge and effort thus becomes a burden. This might take the form of a mental process stuck on a particular solution without any effort being made to see if it is indeed the right solution. In Scenario 3, the human is able or willing to investigate, but senses something that is important and wishes to investigate it further, but lacks the mental discipline or ability to critically examine their own prior knowledge to see if they have already heard or seen the answers to their questions before. Human knowledge and effort thus becomes a burden. In Scenario 4, the human is able and willing to investigate, but senses something that is important and wishes to investigate it further, but lacks the mental humility to admit to any ignorance they might have. Human knowledge and effort thus becomes a burden. Does this categorisation make sense? Do these scenarios describe four mutually exclusive scenarios? The book suggests that the fourth scenario is the most likely way that human knowledge can become a burden to those that are no longer needed. A: You've made 4 reasonably coherent scenarios based on the descriptions of boredom and intellectual disengagement, and I think that they do form a coherent set of scenarios. All that's missing is the example of "the inability to listen", but I think
