The Pen tool is a sculpting tool that lets you draw lines, polygons and curves. Select a Tool from the Pen Toolkit to begin drawing. Once you've made a selection, it can be modified with the Brush tool or the Eraser tool. The Brush tool has a number of settings, including the Paint Bucket which can remove unwanted details or areas of the image, or create patterns, or an object as you would paint with a brush. The Mixer Brush can produce a gradient using the Brush's color setting to blend colors and hues together. The Brush Tips tool is a little icon above the Brush tool that gives you information about your brush as you move it across the screen. The Gradient Tool lets you create gradients, which blend colors or patterns across an image. Adjustment Layers can be used to modify your image without changing the original pixels. Use Image → Adjustments → Levels to create an adjustment layer. The Wrinkles tool creates rectangular scarves, flowered patterns or wavy lines on an image. The Pencil Tool lets you paint on top of images. The Gradient tool lets you create a gradient of colors or patterns. The Facial Features tool lets you edit the facial features of someone in an image. The Gradient Tool works like the Gradient tool in Elements. The Texture and Reflection Tools apply textures and reflections to objects. The Gradient tool lets you create colorful gradients, which blend two colors together as you drag it across an image. The Merge Layers tool merges objects on top of each other. The Pathfinder tool is useful for group different layers into a single "group." The Auto Mask feature allows you to turn an image into a colored mask by clicking on a point in the image and getting a colored mask. The Liquify filter lets you edit and warp an image by dragging a control point. The Brush tool has a multitude of settings, including the Paint Bucket which can remove unwanted details or areas of the image, or create patterns, or an object as you would paint with a brush. But some of the biggest wins for the ordinance came in Seattle, where voters rejected a new income tax on income exceeding $250,000, and a levy on businesses that would have raised more than $1 million. Both measures squeaked by by margins of a few hundred votes. The income tax was approved by just about the same margin as the sales tax, 57-43 percent, while the business tax passed 58-42 percent. The votes in both cases were strikingly similar to other recent elections, with the only clear difference being that the business tax was opposed by groups that would suffer financially from a higher business tax, including the regional chamber of commerce and labor. But one of the most familiar arguments on both sides was what some election observers said was a clever way to frame the sales tax: It was a levy of 15 cents, or about 4 percent, on the average household. "That is what most people understand," said Michael Switzer, a spokesman for the No Tax on Jobs campaign, which was comprised of unions and other anti-tax groups. "The question for voters is, do you want to take 15 cents out of my paycheck?" Mr. Switzer noted that the income tax, which would have raised about $850 million to be shared between the city and county, was a whopping 46 cents on the dollar. The mayors of several Seattle suburbs, including Kirkland, Lakewood, Medina and Tukwila, and the county's president, George Bush, endorsed the income tax measure. Image Alfred C. Hausman Credit... Courtesy of Alfred C. Hausman Though the opposition was seen as more organized, opponents, like Ms. Rosenblum, say that the mayor and elected leaders in some of the suburbs were drawn to the measure because the income tax would have hit their voters hardest. "What's wrong with taxing me, but when they do it, they're taxing everybody?" said Barbara Pavek, a housewife and retiree who lives in Medina. Ms. Pavek said she was against the income tax because of fears it would lead to a sales tax. Her view is widely shared in the suburbs, where sales taxes are normally the lowest or not much higher than income taxes. The head of the local chamber of commerce, Jack Slater, was among those endorsing the income tax. "Our
