Called "Operational Control" or "O.C." for short, the system is used for cruise control in foreign ports. To keep it running, the ship's crew must constantly monitor radios and computer screens. The marine C4ISR system has its origins in the Cold War, when there were fears that the Soviet Union might be infiltrating Western naval forces via intelligence operatives or spies. To counter such threats, U.S. Navy commanders learned to lock out parts of the ship that could be easily subverted, leaving computer systems and military sensors operational by a master key that couldn't be compromised. In the last decade, the system has been repurposed to thwart cyber-attacks, with the U.S. Navy's fleet of EA-18G electronic jamming planes and the Coast Guard using it to protect themselves against pirates. The Aegis ships are overseen by the U.S. 6th Fleet, which reports to the U.S. 7th Fleet. The most recent report by the 6th Fleet describes the its anti-piracy effort as "intense" and noted that "cyber-attacks" on Navy and U.S. ship-based systems have increased in frequency. The Polish Navy's new flagship was named after Andrzej Boguszewicz-Bielawski, the commander-in-chief of the Polish Navy between 1992 and 2003, who as commander of the 6th Marine Corps fought the Soviet Army's 51st Army Corps in the defense of western Poland during the last days of World War II. The ship made its maiden voyage in 2005, and has sailed more than 2 million miles since then.
