Both Photoshop and Illustrator have own versions of layers in the Illustrator program. Use the "Save for Web and Devices" command in Photoshop to export your raster images into Illustrator files. Then you can work on your PSD file and save it as a PDF to hand to your customer. Or, if the work is for an online or print format, you can export the final document as a file in Portable Document Format (PDF). That way, you can work in Photoshop and send your customer a.pdf file that will look exactly like the final file created for print. "They already allow access to the data through a seemingly unrelated interface, through an in-built tablet configuration platform. A possible alternative could be an application which enables users to access, through an app, the data which they already have access to." "It's the security of the data that's at stake," he said. "Once you've got the data, how do you know you can trust the system you've built to be secure? Microsoft could have done a job on there, the details could have been more transparent. We need to see the screen, really see the screen, before you start trusting that it's secure." The new Australian government contract will allow the introduction of new software and methods to supplement the existing hardware and software in its data centres, Mr Smith said. He would not comment on the value of the contract, which he said was likely to remain secret. Mr Smith said that a new contract with Microsoft, which would provide more access to the same data, would be "a time bomb" for the new government. He said that Labor had no plans to build its own data centres, but would use the new contract to procure new hardware and software. Mr Smith said that it was "strange" that the Opposition would not support the government's desire to keep information under lock and key, a move that would make the government more secure. "I would agree with the policy that if we are going to make information public, we should be very secure about the way that information is released and who has access to it," he said. "It would be in the interests of the government to be transparent about what they're doing, but it should never be done through lock and key mechanisms." Asked whether he thought the new government's platform design had been compromised by the former Labor government's platform design, Mr Smith said it was clear the government wished to avoid the similar problems the former government had experienced. Mr Smith said that it was now important that technology companies worked with government on ethical development of systems so that the public was not held back by possible security weaknesses. "We've all got to be wary of the new interface, let's be really sure it's got the right security mechanisms," he said. "I think we can afford to be naive about our own technology, but as you've just reminded me, we can't afford to be naive about the technology of others."Dobrodošlo
