Civilian workers cleaning the Nivar Dam in Qatar (CBC) On Wednesday, Jan. 11, the official Qatar News Agency reported that "the massive dam at Nivar at the country's northern tip will be kept 'at the minimum level" for a month. "The hydroelectric dam is located south of the city of Doha and the report says that the evacuation, which began Wednesday at 3 p.m., is to prevent erosion caused by torrential rains," reports Al Jazeera English.

The 11-metre high gravity dam is located within the Gulf country's southern border and was built in 1974. Qatar's geological survey report of the country's hydrocarbon reserves in 2009 concluded the Nivar Dam was being assessed to determine if the reservoir can collect enough water in case of floods or to control the flow of water in case of droughts. A "decision will be taken soon on the need to operate the dam," the Qatari official said. Doha Qatar capital Doha. According to the Guardian, quoting the New York Times, Nivar's dam manager "said that this was a result of heavy rain that began in the area on Sunday, which continues to fall." The report adds that the reservoir is reported to be running "at a level of barely 15m above the minimum level required for safety." Predictive value
