The effectiveness of the use of different types of free bovine cells in combination with autologous stem-cell transplantation for the reparation of the hematopoiesis in immunodeficiency induced by prolonged treatment with cytostatics was estimated. First, the effect of bovine thymocytes on the proliferation of human thymocytes was studied. As the result, the simultaneous transplantation of thymocytes obtained from cattle up to the 10th week of age (containing only a few immunocompetent cells) with the stem cells produced a more favorable prognosis in comparison with transplantation of the latter cells combined with the cells of the bone marrow of cattle up to the 5th week of age (containing a substantial amount of lymphocytes). Allogenic stem-cell transplantation does not produce any destructive effect on the functional activity of autologous stem-cell transplantation. The same was established for cells of the cornea, adipose tissue, bile, intestinal mucous membrane, urine, and the eye lens which were effective in combination with autologous stem-cell transplantation.
