Congenital defects and genetic disorders are the leading cause of infant mortality, accounting for 40 to 50% of all deaths in the first year of life. Most genetic defects affect the developing placenta, in particular processes that form functional syncytiotrophoblasts at the maternal surface of the placenta and protect the developing fetus. The main goal of this proposal is to identify novel therapeutic targets for pre-natal treatment of human disease by using the Rhesus monkey. We will combine a previously validated gene-targeting system that will allow us to rapidly generate targeted mutations in rhesus monkey DNA with the latest molecular and in vitro embryo-based technologies. These methods enable us to examine in detail the impact of altered gene expression on placental and maternal-fetal function. The Specific Aims of this proposal are:

Aim 1) To generate fetal gene-targeted rhesus monkey embryos. Aim 2) To examine the impact of altered gene expression during gestation on gestation length, placental and fetal survival. Aim 3) To determine the phenotype of fetal rhesus monkey gene-targeted mice. Aim 4) To determine the effects of altered gene expression during gestation on placental and fetal development. The successful completion of these experiments will improve our understanding of the molecular mechanisms by which fetal genes control placental and maternal-fetal development in rhesus monkeys. In addition, these experiments will establish a novel model system for the study of placental and fetal development in an animal that can be used for therapeutic testing of novel treatments for human pregnancy.

In vitro radiation-induced dysfunction in human lymphocytes. Using a microculture technique, the in vitro response of peripheral blood lymphocytes to graded doses of X-irradiation was studied.

Lymphocytes obtained from 12 patients with leukemia, seven with inborn defects in DNA repair, three with combined inherited and acquired defects and five control subjects were exposed to 0-4.5 Gy. Their ability to respond to mitogens was scored and compared to a standard cell line. Lymphocytes from most of the repair-deficient individuals were significantly more radiosensitive than the control cells. The capacity of irradiated lymphocytes to synthesise DNA was assessed by measuring [3H]thymidine incorporation, but no correlation was found between the two phenomena. Previous studies in rodents indicated that the selective serotonin reuptake inhibitor, fluoxetine, blocks sleep following acute, subchronic, or chronic administration. This effect has been consistently replicated. Other classes of antidepressants have yielded variable results in the rat. In the present study, the antidepressant drugs, imipramine and mianserin, and the dopamine agonist, bromocriptine, were given acutely and chronically to in-house rats to assess the effects of these compounds on sleep. Shortened latencies to first episode of generalized movement were observed in imipramine-treated rats. There was also evidence for altered postures, e.g., an increase in the number of rats on their side in the midst of the previous sleep bout. Rats treated with mianserin or bromocriptine were unaffected by sleep time, postures, or scores on the swim test. Thus, overall, it is clear that imipramine produces a general enhancement of activity in the rat, and this is the case even when sleep is ongoing.
