If you wish to.The present invention relates to a hydraulic control system for an automotive transmission and, more particularly, to a solenoid operated control valve for enabling a transmission to attain shift control under predetermined conditions. As is well known, an automotive transmission generally includes a valve system which has a main line and a pressure line, each of which is operated through a solenoid-operated control valve. Upon an energizing of the solenoid for opening or closing the valve, the transmission is shifted in either a speed range or a shift range of the transmission. In this type of a hydraulic control system, the transmission is generally provided with a so-called manual valve which is operated under the control of a clutch pedal, for regulating or stopping a supply of the pressure fluid to the transmission. A vehicle operator is thus capable of shifting the transmission by manually operating the clutch pedal without the solenoid of the control valve. However, the solenoid is still required to perform the control of the transmission when the vehicle operator has forgotten to operate the clutch pedal. In such a case, the transmission may shift to undesired speed range or shift range so that the transmission is put into an uncontrollable state. Therefore, to avoid this inconvenience, the control valve is provided with a shift bypass switch which is manually operated for allowing the fluid to pass through the solenoid under predetermined conditions. An example of a conventional control valve is illustrated in FIG. 4. This control valve is basically constructed in such a way that a spool 102 is axially moved along a main line of a valve body 100. As the spool 102 is moved, a valve bore 108 formed in the spool 102 is selectively closed or opened by an upper cover 110 and a lower cover 112. A spring 113 is supported on the spool 102 and urges the spool 102 to maintain a closed state thereof. A spring-loaded annular slide valve 114 is disposed in the spool 102 and has a central opening therethrough. The slide valve 114 is urged toward a predetermined open position (overflow position) or a predetermined closed position (shutdown position) by the pressure of the fluid in the main line.
