“HyperMotion Technology gives us much greater freedom to implement how we create and animate football moments,” said Matt Giyan, Head of Gameplay Technology, Sports Interactive. “It also lets us capture the speed and rhythm of the match, so we can capture the ‘big moments’ like long clearances, long goals, and headers.” Artists on the FIFA development teams use this information to build and test animation and player models, and to give players more control and fluidity through the ball. They’re able to make subtle changes such as adding smaller or less subtle animations to a player’s footwork. “We use the system to precisely control actions at either end of the pitch, and also to enable us to give player models lots of freedom of movement,” said Giyan. “It’s also a great way of testing and iterating, so when we’re filming, we can compare the behaviour of the game engine to that of the player and see if we’re on the right track.” HyperMotion Technology is a first-of-its-kind technology that provides a new level of detail in the most realistic game engine. According to Giyan, “the system uses the information gathered from the players to model every aspect of the game, from goalkeeper collisions and player movement, to collision and pass reaction. It's really exciting to be able to give players the freedom to run and move with a level of precision that's never been possible before."

HyperMotion Technology is set to feature in key changes to gameplay systems, such as Pro and EAS modes, where skillful plays and situations are crucial to success. The new motion capture technology will be available to all PC players in Fifa 22 Activation Code and free to all Xbox One owners across all modes. It will also be included in a new FIFA Ultimate Team update at launch and available to PS4 owners in May. The new motion capture technology will be available in FIFA 19 via Ultimate Team in December.[Clinical application of bone marrow targeting in oncology: a review].
