However, the non-life-threatening pediatric epilepsy is not necessarily out-patient-friendly. For such pediatric epileptic seizures, the outpatient therapy may be an attractive treatment option since the patients are needed to be isolated from the community and to keep the daily regimen of outpatient therapy without jeopardizing their quality of life. The outpatient therapy is usually conducted by a neuropsychiatrist and should be performed in a fixed interval, for example, three to four times a week. The neuropsychiatrist should administer the regimen over a long period of time (more than 8 weeks). The neuropsychiatrist should apply the outpatient therapy to many patients.

Although there is a close association between seizures and cortical dysplasia in tuberous sclerosis complex (TSC), the nature of the relationship between these phenomena is yet to be elucidated. We studied brain imaging, EEG, and histopathology in four children with TSC, known to have cortical dysplasia, who died suddenly and were found to have severe frontal lobe epilepsy. Cortical dysplasia was also detected in eight young TSC patients who died suddenly, but there was no apparent epilepsy. Cortical dysplasia in TSC is a relatively common cause of epilepsy that differs from infantile cortical dysplasia in that the former persists for a long time.
