JapanAirline 787 Dreamliners are the most efficient, environmentally friendly aircraft in the sky. These are the quietest, safest and the greenest passenger jets in the world. Yet it wasn't uncommon for airlines to make changes by inserting new parts from old planes in place of new parts. Because of this, all global 787s have been grounded for renewed inspections and safety improvements! Now the boring and extremely easy process of coming to a complete stop become an exciting new challenge. Japan airline Dreamliner has a fatal crash in to the sea after trying to land a flight in stormy weather in Fukuoka. The airline is desperately working to get the plane back into the air with an innovative plan including pushing the plane off the end of the runway and trailing it behind the aircraft as it climbs to make space for takeoff. An official with Japan's data-sharing system, JTAC, says the crew made an emergency landing request about 9.30am today fearing bad weather would prevent any other aircraft from taking off. It was the airline's first-ever flight with the new wide-body, twin-aisled aircraft, which take 19 passengers to destinations in Asia and the US. It was flying to Japan's second city, Osaka, the Osaka International Airport says. The company tweeted that it will provide full assistance in the investigation. The flight was operated by All Nippon Airways, the seventh largest airline in Japan. You can license this story through AP Archive:
