The majority of us are familiar with the term “middle class” in the US. It’s a term applied to those who earn an average pay. This is typically reached around the upper third of the income distribution – the 70% top bracket on the chart to the right. In our recent work, we’ve been seeing more and more that the term “middle class” has lost a lot of definition. In the US, there is an entire new group of people who’ve been coming into the middle class over the past 30 years or so. The same story plays out in the UK and parts of Europe. When I’m asked to define the middle class, the term I give is individuals, like you and I, in the lower half of the economic distribution who keep more of their earnings. It has typically been the point where all of the resources are available to raise a family, save for a house or two. There are a number of ways we can define the middle class – tax brackets, inflation-adjusted pay, total earnings, total income. In my piece “Young, White and Middle Class,” I use all of these definitions and show that they converge in different places around the world. We are in the middle of one of the longest bull markets in US history, and we’ve been noticing something interesting. This fits in with our latest research showing the primary driver of income inequality is the rise of merit pay, mostly for the top 30%. One of the largest challenges to understanding what’s going on is that in the US, the middle class has been on a long journey for the past four decades. Working for the middle class has been an evolving process. As we move forward, we should be able to identify some of the most important macroeconomic trends affecting middle class incomes, and understand what role merit pay might play in pushing up or lowering middle class incomes. Here’s my list, in rank order: 1. Middle class incomes in the US have been rising for 40 years. According to the National Income and Product Accounts published by the US Bureau of Economic Analysis, in real terms, middle class incomes rose from $52,200 in 1973 to $75,000 in 2012, a total increase of 28%. Further, inflation-adjusted income has increased from $47,200 in
