For example, U.S. Pat. No. 6,302,706 B1 discloses a handle for actuation of a window or door which is adjustable in a comfortable manner in the sense of acquiring a grip for movement of the window or door panel. The frame of the handle is movably supported in a housing and can be fixed at a particular position by a locking element. A cable is guided in the housing and is provided at its end with a hook. The hook is engageable in a locking notch in the housing and in an opening in the frame. The frame can then be adjusted into a locked position and thus fixed at a particular position by pushing it into the housing to wedge the hook into the locking notch. The cable can be wound up and the position of the frame set accordingly. The problem of actuation elements of the type in question is in this case that, in order to transfer movement to a panel, in the event of functional failure of the cable or the locking element, the actuation element must be removed in order to be able to release the panel. To this end, it is necessary in this case for this locking element to be accessible on the interior side of the frame of the actuation element. This makes it particularly difficult to visually check whether this locking element is functional or not. This problem is in particular relevant in the case of childproof actuation
