Note that images for websites or magazines typically are created in camera, not in Photoshop. For example, a DSLR can capture a broad-spectrum image that includes bright light, medium-light, and dark areas in one shot. But in a photo that will be enlarged and printed, these same images are usually separated into distinct layers that are then manipulated in Photoshop. Powerful and versatile With Photoshop you can perform any edits you see fit, regardless of how modest or graphic you'd like to make them.

With a few simple clicks you can change a color, erase or delete objects from your image, add text, change the size, position, and style of anything you see, and, yes, improve and change the look of the photo. You can perform all of these actions by using tools such as the Pen tool and the Paint Bucket tool, and tools to add various effects (like vignettes), as well as editing paths and clipping paths. And tools and features in Photoshop can be applied to both photos and graphics. How much do you edit? When your images are edited the same way over and over (a la the onion effect) and used in a sequence, an image becomes an animated GIF file or a clip art file. Whether you're producing a single image or an entire animated series, that's the direction you want to move in. The more you edit and play with your images, the less useful you will find them. Only you can determine how much editing you want or how many levels of editing in Photoshop you feel comfortable doing before you're satisfied with the result. You'll rarely get an unedited version of an image. Even with the best professional-quality cameras, there's no way to avoid some slight imperfections in most of the images shot. But the more you use your editing skills to correct those imperfections, the fewer the chances that you'll have any to deal with. Artists and designers have been using the Adobe Photoshop skill set to create things (and to do the editing of those creations) for over 30 years. Photoshop is a testament to the power of a single tool. To see how many layers you have and their names, choose Window⇒Layers to display your Layers palette (refer to Figure 9-1). In the Layers palette, you can see the numbers next to the layer names, indicating the number of layers and the level of effects being applied. As

Sunday, 19 October 2009 Healing Others is not as hard as healing yourself When it comes to healing others as opposed to yourself, it can be a little tricky. I like to think of myself as reasonably self-sufficient, which is nice, although I also try to meet the needs of my family, even if it means bending over backwards at times. The truth is, I can't be everywhere for everyone. I'm pretty selfish, actually, having to listen to others' problems and wishing I had the time and energy to spend on them. You see, I'm not a magician. I don't possess powers that can make people's pain and illness vanish. I have only a limited understanding of the power of love and forgiveness, although I'm learning. I think I was pretty lost the last time someone I loved was dying. I tried to help, but all I could think about was myself. I'm a woman. I'm exhausted, and I don't know what to say. I don't know what to do. It's not about me. It's not even about me and my husband. It's about the other person, and my relationship with him, and my understanding of what will make him happy. When the cancer returned and my husband had to go back to the hospital for tests and treatments, I was just looking forward to going with him. I didn't want to be there alone. He wanted me to be there, and I was happy for the chance to be with him again. I wanted to spend time with him before he went. I wanted to be together. When I was in the car and on the freeway, I did the best I could to stay out of his mind. I knew he'd want to be alone with his thoughts, and I didn't want to be a distraction. But I was struggling to not let my mind drift too much. How do you not think about the person who is dying in your arms? And about the possibility of losing your husband? Or losing him to cancer, anyway. How do you not think about that? I felt extremely stupid and inadequate, as well as guilty and frustrated and afraid. Worst of all was the knowledge that all of this was happening to him, and that I
